AHP – Home care service Nadia Qani

“Taking into account culturally sensitive, individual care”

BUSINESS THROUGH ADDED VALUE AND HIGH REGARD

“Foreign born home care patients often hoped that they would be returning to their homeland. However, most of them remain in Germany and home care in their native language is very important”, explains Nadia Qani, owner of AHP. “We have to give them the feeling that they are at home as part of this society. In my opinion the only way a country can complete globally is when the interests revolve around its people and when people from various cultures find their place in society; this is business through added value and high regard.”

A person is an indivisible whole. Taking care of them means culturally sensitive care. The AHP team respects individual wishes and needs. “Respect for faith and hope in a peaceful world are the reasons for our actions. It is important that the people are cared for in the environment and language with which they are familiar”, according to the entrepreneur, who has 53 employees representing 23 countries and 37 languages.

All of them speak German and have completed their training and received the appropriate qualifications. “We offer positions for future advancement and carefully select our employees. And our international staff should promote the German qualities of punctuality, accuracy and correct behavior”, stresses Nada Qani. For this is also integration, and the award winning German-Afghani is always wondering how she can help integrate people from other countries into German society.
